| I was absolutely thrilled to read about the Science Corps programme. The story of Ben Rubin's post-PhD experience really rings true for me. I would love to gain a wider world-view, having been glued to the computer screen for the last three years, and am very envious of my physician friends who can explore the world whilst contributing on the journey! I think that sharing my passion for science and maths with budding young minds who likely have very different perspectives on a whole host of things would be a win-win experience. I was blessed with some really energetic and inspiring teachers at school who took on mentor roles, and therefore understand just how much of an impact this can have on a student. As for my passion for building STEM capacity worldwide: knowledge, attained through scientific endeavours, has been proven to be the precursor for improvement across pretty much all metrics relating to quality of life, and therefore strikes me as a basic human right. |

Having just finished the PhD, this is the big question! I know I definitely want to continue working in science, potentially continuing in research, but definitely with a teaching and mentoring aspect (whether that be part of the role, or the full job). I think the opportunity to join the Science Corps mission would be a real eye-opener for the best route forward. If I do continue in research, I think I might focus on AI-driven immune therapeutics (discovering new drugs and understanding their interaction with the immune system). I know for sure I would love to live abroad to gain broader and deeper experiences, likely both two and ten years into the future.
